And he is opposed to paying the United States bonds, because it would break up the national banking system. Hence, he is troubled about the revenue, and wants it diverted into some other channel. He proposes to congress in this letter to the speaker, the this money be expended in estructing expensive fortifications New York and other ports on the sea coast. He seems to have forgotten that this government is not fashioned after the monarchies of the old world. He ignores the fact that the Jeffersonian democracy which he professes not only denies the di vine right of kings and priests, but denies also the necessity or propriety for standing armies, immense forts and expensive fortifications. It asserts the full and equal rights of all men; and in time of danger relies upon the god of battles, the justice of its cause, and the patriotism and bravery of a free-citizen

Besides, Mr. Tilden knows that there is not the least danger of an attack upon th United States by any foreign power. Th The combined powers of Europe would not dare attack us; and if such an attempt were made, their fleets would be de-stroyed in less than three months by our explosive inventions. No, it is not the public safety that prompted this suggestion. It is a willy effort to preserve the present high protective tariff, and prevent the surplus revenue from going into its proper channel and being applied in payment of the public debt. While Mr. Tilden is the great high priest of this so-called Eastern Democracy, President Cleveland is by virtue of his position its active agent. And withstanding the present scarcity money and consequent low prices of produce and labor, resulting in general nation of business, and oppression of the debtor classes, the president recommends that the colnage of silver be stopped. For this extraordinary proposition he assigns two reasons, neither of which are tenable. He says that the silver will not circulate, and that a vast amount has accumulated in the treasury. Does not the president of the United States know that a silver dollar, notwith standing its intrinsic value, is cents, and that it contains t july cents have entered into a contest from which of flat money, is nevertheless a legal ten-they are bound to emerge with far less der for 100 cents; and that if he would class in favor of another that demands regulation by congress.
